Armenian President Armen Sarkissian has not signed the amendments to the Electoral Code, which provide for the rejection of the rating system of voting.

Thus, according to the press service of the head of the Armenian state, the law was signed by the president on April 2. The document was discussed with the heads of a number of political forces, political figures, representatives of the Central Election Commission, listened to their opinions and comments. "Studies conducted by the presidential administration have shown that the law is not deliberately problematic from the point of view of constitutionality," the report says.

At the same time, according to the press service, the president has fundamental comments. In particular, it is indicated that the amendments were supported only by the political majority of the parliament. "The President of the Republic will not sign the law, but will not apply to the Constitutional Court to determine its compliance with the Constitution," the statement on the website of the President of Armenia reads.
