Marion Solletty

From Italy to France, nationalist leaders are reassessing their ties with the U.S. president as his brand sours across the EU.

For Europe's populist right, U.S. President Donald Trump's embrace was once seen as a political asset. Not anymore.

For years, nationalist leaders across the continent treated the American president's support as proof that their politics had gone global. But with major elections looming in 2027, including in Italy, France and Poland, many are rethinking the value of that transatlantic backing.
