Late last year, the EU tweaked laws allowing member states to have a persons claim for asylum heard somewhere abroad.

Now, discussions are taking place to create a so-called processing centre in a foreign country, where the asylum seekers who initially landed in Europe would have their case for protection heard.

Nina Gregori, who heads the Malta-based European Union Agency for Asylum (EUAA), floated the idea in a passing remark about possible innovative solutions on migration control at the International Centre for Migration Policy Development (ICMPD) conference in Vienna on Tuesday (17 November).
