

THE ARMENIAN DIASPORA, STATE CONTROL, AND THE LIMITS OF DIASPORA POLITICS

Introduction

Debates on so-called state-controlled diaspora models have gained prominence in discussions of how states relate to their citizens and kindred communities abroad. This commentary engages with arguments advanced about the Turkish state's approach to diaspora policies and assesses what can reasonably be regarded as a legitimate pattern of state-citizen interaction. Against this conceptual background, the analysis turns to the specific case of the Armenian diaspora and its relationship with the Republic of Armenia, highlighting how particular configurations of activism and influence can generate tensions between sovereign decision-making and expectations articulated from outside the country.

The Claim of a State-Controlled Diaspora Model

In the text under discussion, Türkiye and Azerbaijan are presented as operating a centrally directed state-controlled diaspora model, in which diaspora organizations abroad function as coordinated extensions of state policy, like the arms of an octopus. [1] This depiction works with an implicit assumption: once a state establishes central mechanisms and institutions to engage its citizens or kin communities abroad, this is taken as evidence of manipulation or authoritarian control. Such a framing, however, overlooks a basic reality of international practice: sovereign states routinely create specialized bodies to sustain cultural, social, economic, and consular links with their citizens and related communities abroad, and these functions are both normal and legitimate in contemporary diplomacy.

State-Diaspora Relations

Building on the previous discussion, the analysis proceeds by normalizing what is often problematized in the state-controlled diaspora narrative. If the mere existence of central institutions is treated as proof of manipulation, then almost every sovereign state would fall under the same accusation, since it is standard practice to maintain official bodies responsible for citizens and related communities abroad.

Central coordination, in this view, is not inherently suspect; it enables legitimate functions such as cultural preservation, consular protection, economic cooperation, and structured political consultation. The real difficulty arises when diaspora activism itself ignores host [\[1\]](#) laws and priorities and seeks to exercise direct leverage over homeland policy from a distance. From this perspective, the focus should therefore shift away from demonizing state institutions toward scrutinizing how diaspora actors use or misuse their influence on the homeland.[\[2\]](#)

The Specific Case of the Armenian Diaspora

When this general framework is applied to concrete cases, the Armenian diaspora stands out in several respects. Most members of this diaspora are not citizens of Armenia but of their respective host states, and thus their primary legal and political allegiance lies with those countries rather than with Yerevan. Despite this, certain influential segments seek a decisive voice in Armenia's core sovereign decisions, including questions of borders, security, relations with neighbouring states, recognition policies, and historical claims. [\[3\]](#)

This situation generates a structural tension: communities located outside Armenia often advocate maximalist positions without directly bearing the costs of potential instability, renewed isolation, or conflict. In practice, such dynamics may narrow the Armenian government's room for pragmatic engagement with its neighbours and risk turning diaspora-homeland relations into a form of external tutelage over a sovereign state.[\[4\]](#)

Comparing Turkish and Armenian Diasporas

Against this backdrop, it becomes important to consider how different diaspora communities position themselves in their host societies and toward their homelands. Turkish communities abroad have, in general, prioritized integration, respect for the rule of law, and everyday coexistence within their host countries, while still maintaining strong cultural and emotional ties to Türkiye. [\[5\]](#)

By contrast, activism in parts of the Armenian diaspora has frequently been organized around hardline and exclusivist narratives vis [\[6\]](#) Türkiye and Azerbaijan, with identity politics built on perpetual confrontation rather than accommodation. Persistent demonization and absolutist rhetoric in this context tend to harden positions, hinder reconciliation, and weaken incentives for compromise in Armenia and its neighbourhood. In addition, diaspora politics grounded in hostility and racialized discourse not only strains bilateral relations but also undermines the credibility of such actors in pluralistic, liberal-democratic environments.[\[6\]](#)

Sovereignty, Responsibility, and a Healthier Model

The discussion thus returns to the initial problematization of state [] diaspora models with a clearer distinction between normal state practice and genuinely troubling patterns of activism. The fundamental question is not whether a state engages with its diaspora, but whether that engagement is consistent with sovereignty, democratic accountability, and the rule of law.

A sustainable approach requires diaspora actors, particularly in the Armenian case, to recognize the primacy of Armenias citizens in determining national priorities and risk assessments. Responsible engagement should support peace, normalization, and regional stability rather than constrain them through uncompromising demands and exclusionary narratives. Transparent, law [] diaspora policies on all sides, combined with a shift away from hostility [] activism, can help neutralize external manipulation and open genuine space for reconciliation.
