At the 80th session of the United Nations General Assembly, Kazakh President Kassym-Jomart Tokayev delivered a speech highlighting both the achievements of the UN and the urgent need for reform. He framed the organization as a vital force for global cooperation but warned that it must adapt to new realities to remain effective, Kazinform News Agency correspondent reports.

Building on this, Tokayev emphasized that global leaders bear a moral responsibility to choose cooperation over conflict. He argued that the current trajectory of international relations risks leaving future generations with heavier burdens.

State leaders have a responsibility to move toward making peace, a failure of the current generation of leaders to act is not an option, because future generations will pay a much greater price, he stated.
